Bodyguard

Bodyguard treated pine sidings have been used successfully in New Zealand since the 1970's and for well over a decade here in Northern California. The wood is sourced from the Radiata (Monterey) Pine plantation forests of New Zealand. Bodyguard's durability comes from its treatment process. EPA approved fungicides, primarily used in food crop protection and an EPA approved insecticide are used to give the lumber its rot and termite resistance. A 30 year limited warranty is provided on all properly installed Bodyguard products. The most remarkable fact is that these beautiful, well-manged pine forests were created from seedlings collected from trees in the Monterey and Santa Cruz area of California some hundred years ago. At a full 3/4" thick these profiles are a great natural wood siding alternative.

Decking

Genuine Mahogany (Swietenia Macrophylla), is native to Honduras and Central America. The wood was among the most highly prized in the world due to its dimensional stability, natural durability, superb machining properties and rich color. It has been used for everything from fine musical instruments to boat building. Sadly given its unique properties, it was widely exploited in the past. Recognizing the problem, the British started planting Genuine Mahogany trees in plantations in Fiji right after the Second World War. The trees have grown well and, amazingly, there is an extensive amount of natural regeneration and forest growth. The forests are sustainably managed with low impact, selective harvesting. The net result is an abundant and renewable supply of good quality mahogany lumber.

The wood has been used with success in both New Zealand and Australia for a number of exterior applications including decking, and it is now making its way to the United States. It is attractively priced and is an alternative to Ipe in less demanding applications. The wood comes in a mix of odd and even lengths, heavy to 8' through 13', and, as a result, it is sold only on a random length basis.
